ABSTRACT

This Directory revises the data published by the New England Center for Continuing Education in March 1970. It identifies study abroad programs for any undergraduate period of education (including summers) where credit transfer is possible, and is limited to institutions of higher learning in the New England region. The Directory provides summary information on the programs, with data on the extent of student eligibility, the major content of the program, the aims of the curriculum, the costs of participation, and program duration. III. DATA SHEET FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION 61

INTRODUCTION

This Directory revises the data published by the Center in March 1970. More recent and additional information on study abroad programs conducted by colleges and universities in the New England region is contained in the present Directory. It furthers the aim of providing students, faculty and administrators with comparative information on study abroad programs which now number 135 and are conducted by 65 institutions in New England.[1]

Despite growing disenchantment in the United States with foreign commitments, there is a continuing interest on the part of students in intercultural experiences. With special overseas flight concessions available to younger persons and the prevalence of an air-minded, jet-speed culture, there is less and less excuse for immobility and for avoiding the foreign scene. More and more students experience some form of international education while travel outside of the University is more commonly linked with formal educational advancement than ever before.

International education is seen, and demanded, as essential growth in intellectual awareness. Some of this educational endeavor is understandably valuable but some of it is seen by critics as an extremely wasteful exercise especially intolerable under conditions of economic recession and little understood cultural disturbances at home.

[1]Education and World Affairs reported 636 study abroad programs sponsored by 308 United States colleges and universities in 1967-68. The New England survey then accounts for about one-fifth of the nation's programs and institutions.

Many undergraduates quickly appreciate the potentialities of foreign travel and study abroad. Some have already engaged in overseas study through high school programs. Most undergraduates, however, will not have engaged in serious foreign study or travel by the time they graduate. Many will not have taken courses which touch on international studies. Foreign experience sought by undergraduates frequently aims at general understanding rather than specialized guided education. Many argue that students expand and understand their own cultures more through an exposure to other cultures. Foreign languages are tested within another country and this is regarded as an achievement of cultural value. The growth in knowledge and appreciation of viewpoints of other countries is considered a way of improving the functioning of the United States in political, economic and social affairs abroad. Hopefully, there is an increased awareness abroad of the special features of the American culture.

Motives for study abroad are complex and usually confusing. Origins of programs are frequently fortuitous and haphazard. The development of programs proceeds usually through emulation or other variable circumstances while the original purposes of the program are rarely prolonged or kept in tune with the broader objectives of the home institution. One examination of existing study abroad programs[2] shows that in general they are not achieving their primary goal of cultural immersion. This is because students have insufficient language preparation, spend too short a time abroad, are concentrated in popular overseas university centers, do not associate with foreign nationals enough and crowd out University places for local nationals.

Many of the programs summarized in this Directory claim that the objective is the furthering of the student's personal development or intellectual maturity. If this is the main reason for the foreign experience, questions can be raised as to whether experience in self-development and self-reliance is best gained in a foreign environment. Foreign studies of graduate programs abroad are usually specialized and aim at special academic, professional, or vocational objectives. While some of these objectives are frequently included in undergraduate programs, particularly for language majors, the attempt to enlarge the student groups with overseas involvement leads to undistinctive goals and methods for achieving the goals.

The concept of the Junior Year Abroad Program has been closely examined in recent years, and there are several evaluations and critical comments on the progress and future of these study programs.[3] The major difficulty has been the inability of undergraduates to follow courses as regular students in overseas universities. Attempts to take the American campus abroad reduce the program value as an intercultural experience and are frequently viewed abroad as unsubtle efforts to Americanize the world. Integrating the overseas program with the home campus curriculum has been extremely harmful to many programs. Much care is needed in the selection of faculty and students for overseas programs; attention has to be given to non-cultural encounters, the academic structure and administrative cooperation.

The programs identified in the Directory are study abroad programs for any undergraduate period of education, including summers, where credit transfer is possible. The study is limited to the institutions of higher learning in the New England region, although it is realized that many overseas study opportunities exist and are available to New England students in universities and colleges outside of the New England region. The Directory provides summary information on the study abroad programs, with data on the extent of student eligibility, the major content of the program, the aims of the curriculum, the costs of participation, and its duration.

About one in four of all institutions of higher learning in the New England institutions provide opportunities for their students to pursue studies in a foreign setting. Mostly these opportunities are through the acceptance of credits earned in study programs of foreign universities. Only limited financial assistance is available to make these opportunities available to all students.

Organization of study abroad programs conducted by New England institutions ranges from work in a branch of the U.S. institution abroad to spasmodic acquaintance with an established program of study established by another institution. The stress in this survey has been on identifying those programs which are actually conducted by New England institutions through close affiliation and regular contact with an overseas institution and careful evaluation of the student's work abroad. It cannot be claimed that the institutions included in this survey meet these criteria or indeed recognize any standards for overseas work except their own.

There are numerous programs which recognize overseas programs in a general way rather than specifying study in a particular country or at a stipulated university abroad. The larger programs are frequently closely geared to a finely structured course of studies at an overseas university where relations are of long standing. Overseas areas where programs are conducted by the New England institutions are listed below:

Country	Number of Programs
France	23
Spain	13
Germany	12
Italy	11
United Kingdom	10
Austria	4
Israel, Russia	3 each
Greece, Switzerland	2 each
Canada, Mexico, Turkey, India	1 each

General Foreign Study	23

Foreign language study programs predominate in the list of study abroad programs, but new innovative foreign learning experiences for students in other disciplines are gradually opening up. The traditional European centers for foreign study by American students are being supplemented by programs in the developing countries.

One purpose of the Directory is to provide comparative information to students interested in undertaking study abroad programs. It is hoped that the information will encourage students to select their programs wisely and with greater eventual benefits.

The Directory also aims at providing administrative officers of educational institutions with data on programs conducted by similar institutions in the region. In this way, it is hoped that the information will provide advice and guidance for the formation and rational development of international programs generally, in the New England region. It is possible that many programs have been duplicated by competitive endeavors and have become excessively expensive in administrative cost because of this factor. There appears to be growing need for the careful planning of future overseas study programs since funds for this purpose have become increasingly scarce, and interest in such activities has been replaced by black studies, social issues, and environmental problems of the American economy and society, as well as by such approaches to the "Domestic Year Away", and Urban Forums.

In an effort to keep information of this type as current as possible, a questionnaire is appended to this Directory for use by institutions which revise their programs in 1971-72 or subsequent years, and institutions which were omitted in this survey because of a lack of information.

No claim is made that the data contained in the Directory is complete or accurate in any percise way. The data has been obtained from the best possible sources and, wherever possible, from the directors of the programs themselves. The compilers of this Directory would welcome comments, suggestions, and data on existing and planned study abroad programs conducted by the universities and colleges of the New England region.

Much of the credit for compiling this Directory and its earlier experimental edition is due to the diligence and perseverance of Miss Paula Sanborn. Acknowledgement is made of the support given by Foreign Student Advisers and directors of Study Abroad Programs at many institutions in New England and elsewhere and of the numerous suggestions made by commentators on the first edition.
